- ♦ The manager is the key to the success of a team. It is a manager's responsibility to get the best out of their staff.
- ♦ It is therefore vital that managers implement strategies to improve the performance competence of their staff. Staff training needs to be a matter of the highest priority with successful managers.
- ♦ Managers must be in touch with the needs of their staff and take into account the many psychological and emotional factors which impact on an individual's performance.
- ♦ It is imperative that good managers make allowance for these factors when considering the performance management of staff.

Question 4: Name 2 (two) guidelines which you can follow when choosing to change yourself through self development

- ♦ Write down your goal, in a measurable form if you can, and give yourself a deadline.
- ♦ Armed with some goals, set about designing yourself a learning programme and finding the appropriate resources. This depends on what you want to learn.
- ♦ Learning is a social affair – you need feedback, encouragement and the help of friends to pinpoint your goals, devise your learning programmes and to keep you going. Encourage this support.
- ♦ Commit to keep on with your learning programme. “Stickability” and perseverance – whatever you choose to call it.
- ♦ Assess yourself against your goals. How well are you doing? If you set lots of learning sub-goals, then these make good points at which to test yourself. This point takes you back to the first. Testing yourself leaves you feeling satisfied – in which case you stop learning – or dissatisfied, in which case you carry on, heading for the next target.

Question 6: Define Discuss 3 (three) suggestions to help you establish and enforce the boundaries of the employer/employee relationship at a typical site:

- ♦ efine the relationship and job position: The employer/employee relationship should be well-defined from the outset and the parameters understood by all parties. Some call it "defining the pecking order" or "establishing the food chain." Whatever colorful term you use it all boils down to this: You can be their boss or you can be their buddy. You can not be both.
- ♦ Establish and adhere to company policies and workplace procedures: It's a good idea to have published policies concerning every aspect of the site, including employee behavior and performance expectations. By it's very nature the employer/employee relationship is prone to favoritism. Managers can't help but favor those employees who work harder, longer, and faster, but when it comes to adhering to company policies and procedures, there should be no preferential treatment of favored employees. Every employee/site should receive a copy of the the company policies and procedure. It should state that they have read, understand, and agree with it. It should also be signed by each employee.
- ♦ The Bottom Line: Treat everyone the same. It does not matter if the employee is a vice president or a janitor; everyone in the company should be treated the same when it comes to adhering to company policies and performance expectations.
- ♦ It's not personal, it's just business: This is what the movie bad guys say to one another right before the shooting starts. "Hey, Paulie, it's not personal. It's just business." BANG!! BANG!! This is the dating equivalent of saying, "It's not you, it's me." These kinds of statements are not going to make anyone feel better when they are getting dumped or fired.
